Class Prophecy

After several years of hard work for small companies as stenographer, I landed a job I called "the thing." I had gotten a stenographer's position at the NBC broadcasting headquarters in New York.

The network had planned a program that was called, "Meeting the People," and it was just that. An announcer was going to tour the nation, visiting small and large cities, talking to everyone possible. Of course he needed a stenographer to go and help him. Much to my surprise, I was chosen to be the one.

Then the idea came to me that through some unusual luck, I might see or hear about some of my old classmates. Before the tour was over, however, I found that more than I hoped for had happened; I heard from them all.

The first one I saw was in Washington. There, Shirley Gentry, pretty as ever, was a private secretary to none other than one of North Carolina's State Senators.

In Richmond, Virginia, I was walking down the street looking for a place to have my hair set when I noticed "Alice's Beauty Salon," on a sign. Tired of looking, I went into this one. I stopped short when I looked into the blue, blue eyes of Nell Hawkins, but later I found that she was no longer Nell Hawkins, but had the "MRS." title and was the mother of two children. She also told me that the Alice she was working for was Alice Wrenn, who was married too, but was out of town on business.

Arriving in North Carolina, the first place we stopped was Roxboro.

Here I saw Eugenia Clayton, who had gotten married right after school was out. She told me that she worked at Collins & Aikman and had one child who would start to school soon. From her I learned that Warsenia and Jackie McKinney owned a prosperous farm outside of town and were busily raising children and tobacco. Next to them lived Talmadge Whitlow and his family on a dairy farm. Eugenia told me Marie Carver, also married, had resigned her position as a textile worker to become a full-time mother and housekeeper.

From Roxboro we went to Burlington. There I saw a girl who the class of '52 could really be proud of. It was Betty Jean Zimmerman. She had graduated from Elon College and because of her outstanding achievements, had become professor of English there.

The next time I saw one of them, I was in Greensboro. It was Essie Mae Tingen. She had finally reached her goal and was coaching girls' basketball and liked it just as well as she did in high school. I asked her about Selma Lowery as I was afraid I wouldn't get to see her. She said that Selma was still filling her secretarial position at Laurinburg.

While on our way from Greensboro to our next city, which was Durham, we saw a slight accident. Thinking we might be of aid, we stopped. Later, the ambulance arrived with a doctor and a nurse. Much to my astonishment, the nurse was Maxine Hawkins. She said she had been at Duke Hospital for two years and that Anne Yarbrough was a registered nurse there. She also told me that she saw Bobby Dixon often as he was assistant coach of football at Durham High School and doing a mighty good job of it.

After we left Durham, I didn't see any more of them until we got to Keesler Air Force Base in Mississippi. There I saw Ben O'Brien and Matt Gentry, very handsome in their blue uniforms. They said they had been in the air force since graduation and were climbing the ladder of success very rapidly.

The next classmate I saw was in Nebraska. Jimmy Bray was living on a large ranch there and had a pretty-faced wife as well as white-faced cattle on it.

In Oklahoma, I saw Lemuel Powell. He had made a fortune in oil and was going to expand his interests soon.

Last, but not the least of them, I saw Shirley Duncan in Texas. She was traveling with her soldier husband and was seeing a lot of this country of ours.

Months later, I arrived back in New York. I was very tired, but felt that more than the program had been a success as I had seen or either heard about the people who hold a dear spot in my memory——my classmates.
